

CLAY

In the mid 1950's, a group of California artists began to disassociate themselves from prevalent attitudes toward the centuries-old ceramic tradition. The CLAY exhibition represents some of the various innovations and directions which began during that period. The traditional approach to clay forms, derived from Oriental concerns and practices, emphasizes the psychological wholeness and physical interrelatedness of surface, form, and function. Two deviations from this tradition began to interest younger artists working in clay: first, that the utility of the vessel itself was no longer a prerequisite for its validity, and second, that clay could be used to create a major art form.

The art climate in California was particularly conducive for the clay revolution. The Far East has had a strong influence upon ceramic art of the West Coast, and educational programs were geared toward a continuation of that long-standing craft tradition. In addition, California artists were physically and psychically removed from the New York-centered art world and its preoccupation with painting and sculpture as fine art. A less formal life-style encouraged a new kind of personal and artistic freedom to flourish. There existed a willingness in a younger group of artist-educators, who were filling new positions in the expanding California colleges and universities, to explore differing approaches in clay, and to support experimental work of students. This has resulted in the phenomenon of a university-perpetuated clay movement, with the majority of contemporary ceramicists being university trained.

Peter Voulkos initiated the widespread reconsideration of the possibilities in ceramic art forms in Los Angeles in 1954. His rejection of the conventional belief that a pot must serve as a vessel allowed for varied and innovative uses of clay. By squashing and disfiguring hand-built and wheel-thrown forms, he de-emphasized symmetry and balance, and allowed raw, broken edges and disruptive angles to appear. RED RIVER (1960) reflects his involvement with the essential characteristics of the medium: its fluidity, texture, and organic quality. His work has been described as a counterpart to the abstract expressionist painting being done concurrently in New York, in that they both revealed a direct interaction of the artist and the medium, with emphasis on the resultant brushwork and physical manipulation of materials.

Because ceramic artists were no longer limited to shapes required by functional vessels, clay could be used in purely sculptural formations. Kenneth Price, a colleague of Peter Voulkos, began exploring biomorphic pod-like shapes, such as S.L. GREEN (1963), and was one of the first artists to forsake glazes for industrial paints of intense color. Price was also involved with the concept of the traditional cup form, but visually questioned the function of its elements through the illogical use of frogs, lizards, and turtles as handles and bases. His BLIND SEA TURTLE CUP (1968) gives the suggestion of utility while confronting the potential user with the distraction of a weighty turtle at the bottom of the cup. It also is a pun on the Indian creation myth that depicts the world formed on the back of an eternal turtle. These conceptual references to the intended function of a vessel are characteristic of many contemporary ceramic works by Voulkos, Price, Arneson, Hudson, and Shaw.

In their quest to create exciting, vital, and technically refined art works from clay, these artists utilized materials and techniques which were not considered appropriate to the art and craft of handmade pottery: glazes and metallic lusters fired at a low temperature which produce bright colors unobtainable from high fire glazes; decals, lettering, and stamped impressions reminiscent of souvenir and dime-store items; and the casting of delicate porcelain objects from molds.

In addition to this concern with process and technique, a number of ceramic pieces utilize humorous, erotic, and bizarre imagery. Robert Arneson has explored common or popular objects such as his SIX-PACK (1964) and BRICKS (1968). TEAPOT (1969), with its phallic spout, is an example of the visual puns which pervade and enhance his work. But while Arneson's humorous sexual metaphor remains a functional teapot, Clayton Bailey's whimsically titled USELESS TEAPOT (1968) manifests contemporary ceramics' desire to escape practicality. In contrast to these two earthenware teapots is the fragile, delicate cast porcelain teapot by Jack Earl, MY GIRL IS A NICE GIRL (1970). Earl's pieces possess a classical grace that is unique, and his specific use of porcelain is especially appropriate in this context.

David Gilhooly manipulates clay into sculptural forms which illustrate episodes of history in a frog civilization. There is the FROG VISITS PARIS CUP (1968), the FROG MOUNTIE COOKIE JAR (1973), and a mysterious Egyptian frog diety MOTHER-IN-LAW MUMMY OF THE NEROIC PERIOD (1972). Gilhooly presents us with a parallel civilization to our own by which we might obtain a new perspective on society. On the other hand, William Wilhelmi employs gargoyle-like monsters to depict familiar members of our culture in his THE FLYING WALLENDAS (1973).

The use of clay as a sculptural medium is further expanded by Marilyn Levine in her realistic depictions of boots, shoes, and KNAPSACK (1970). The natural qualities of clay have been exploited in order to make it resemble materials very different from itself in weight, composition, and flexibility, but strikingly exact in its texture, malleability, and color. The physical characteristics of clay lend themselves to transformations which convincingly suggest leather and cardboard, such as the ceramic wall pieces of Robert Rauschenberg.

Cast porcelain objects of common, familiar items like rocks, twigs, fish, and hatchets, are incorporated into cup and bottle forms to create a sculptural form that visually interferes with the intended function of the piece. Richard Shaw and Robert Hudson have assembled these objects in surreal juxtapositions which draw attention to their enigmatic qualities. Both Hudson and Shaw integrate into the surface of their pieces detailed painting which expands the dimensions and visual force of the work.

This exhibition presents examples of contemporary clay objects that are not widely known or exhibited. The ability of these artists to exploit the inherent potential and adaptability of clay with the whole range of ceramic techniques, and to evoke humorous and surrealist overtones, has infused an ancient art with peculiarly contemporary qualities.

CLAY

May 23 through July 4, 1974

This exhibition has been organized by Richard Marshall, a Helena Rubinstein Fellow in the Whitney Museum's Independent Study Program.

The Downtown Branch Museum is operated under the direction of David Hupert, Head of the Whitney Museum's Education Department. The staff consists of participants in the Whitney Museum's Independent Study Program earning advanced university credit while engaged in full-time research and museum work. The Helena Rubinstein Fellows are: Richard Armstrong, Lake Forest College; Nan Chisholm, Mills College; Brian Gross and Jane Kleinberg, Oberlin College; Richard Marshall, California State University, Long Beach; John Schoonmaker, University of Rochester; and William Zimmer, University of Texas. The administrative coordinator is Toba Tucker.

The Downtown Whitney, located in the Uris Building at 55 Water Street, is entirely supported by the business community of lower Manhattan. The museum is open 11-3 Monday through Friday, admission is free.
